We know all about North Korea's long-range rocket but, much more important, how is the top official in its London embassy transported? It may be one of the poorest countries in Asia, but the ambassador to London of the Democratic People's Republic of Korea (DPRK) has a top of the range Mercedes, with the bashful registration number of PRK1D to take him from the Ealing, west London, embassy. But then he does have to keep up with his flashy southern neighbour - the ambassador of South Korea, or the Republic of Korea, who is whizzed around London in an equally glitzy limousine, ROK1. Instead of an expensive arms race, how about one between the two embassy motors twice round the North Circular?
